

Beam

// stainless steel

Æ//

The beam of light of this standing lamp traces a path through the air from the ground upwards, leaving behind a glow materialized by the base. The brass, reflecting like a mirror, becomes elusive in itself, just like the light it carries. Due to its form, the lamp is strongly connected to the ground. In this way, the light gives the impression that it emerges from the earth, not from the sky as one would expect.

The atypical form of the base distances the object from all archetypal shapes referring to a standing lamp, resulting in a sculpture rather than a lamp. The foot of the base again refers to the other meaning of the word beam and is referring to the silhouette of a metal beam.
